Napoleon in Egypt.

Beneath him stretched the sands

Of Egypt's burning lands.

The desert pointed to the swiftest ray,

The camel's flashing feet,

With slow, uneasy beat,

Threw up the scorching dust like arrow spray,

And drove the sunlight glow,

As young Napoleon rode

Around the Galic camp, companionless that

He mused on Destiny to shape it to his will.

His thoughts were in his mind,

Unspoken to his kind;

Calm was his face—his eyes were blank and

His thin lips were compressed;

The secrets of his breast

Those portals never pass'd, for good or ill;

And dead—yet adored—

His hand upon his sword,

He mused on Destiny to shape it to his will.

Yet in this soul of mine

Is strength as great as thine,

O daffodil of Syria, that wouldst despise me

For grandeur like thine own,

O, melancholy flower,

With forty centuries buried on thy brow!

Deep in my heart I feel

What time shall yet reveal,

That I shall tower o'er men, as o'er these deserts

Thou shalt tower o'er me.

I shall uphold a name

Of never-dying fame,

My deeds shall fill the world with their renown;

Thou shalt succeed my place,

The popular hero's place,

Shall pass the record of my glories down;

And nations yet to be,

Burgling from Time's deep sea,

Small shall their babes the name of great Napooleon.

On history's deathless page,

From wondering age to age, I glow;

New light and reverence o'er that name shall

My deeds already done,

As history begin.

Whose great conclusion centuries shall not know

O, melancholy Spynski!

Present with fame links,

And both shall yet be mine. I feel it in my

Over the mighty chief

There came a shadow of grief,

The lips seemed to move and say,

"Know'st thou this name that I Arise upon my hand?"

Know'st thou where I stand?

Thy deeds are but as sand,

Known on the deathless land,

Think, little mortal, think and pass upon thy

Pass, little mortal, pass!

Grow like the vernal grass—

The common soil shall dress thy prime.

But nations shall thy name

Which were thy hand to hold,

The name of glory, faithful yet sublime.

buckets and a milk-pail, and after the usual salutations of the day had been passed, the Deacon exclaimed—

"Parson Hobbs, we shall have a new-match cow in a few weeks, and I want you to make me one of your best chimes; say, fourteen inches in diameter at the bottom, and at least twenty inches high, tapering; if handmade toward the top, and the whole decorated with as handsome and tasty a lid and dasher, as you ever made in your life."

Now, old Deacon Wood was the wealthiest man in the church, and of course the most influential; and Parson Hobbs found it quite impossible to tell him in plain language that until the old cow was settled, and each advanced for the church, that not a stove should be touched to fulfill the order; but being determined not to compromise his veracity with himself or wife, after his solemn protestations, he meekly replied—

"Very well, Deacon; I leave your directions on paper and I will place them on file, and in due course of time, when work is slack, we will see what we can do."

Not doubting but that he should be successful in victimizing the unsuspecting Pa-ron, and the new chime, with the lid and dasher, were ordered, and the lid and
